Guideline for Preparing Core Clinical Safety Information on Drugs

- Harmonize Company Core Safety Information (CCSI) by all manufacturers
- Conceptualize Development Core Safety Information (DCSI)

- Minimizing confusion among investigators, prescribers and other healthcare professionals due to inconsistencies between the drug safety information of different countries and manufacturers;
- Facilitating access to important information for making rational clinical decisions;
- Eliminating the diversity of national accelerated reporting requirements of different regulators, which result from differences in what constitute unexpected ("unlabelled") adverse drug reactions.

Designing Drugs is Hard

Need to simultaneously optimize many properties:

- Potency
- Selectivity
- Solubility
- Bioavailability
- Clearance / Half-life
- Permeability
- CYP inhibition
- hERG blockade
- Synthesizability
- Toxicity

The slide displays a list of properties to optimize for drug design, including Potency, Selectivity, Solubility, Bioavailability, Clearance / Half-life, Permeability, CYP inhibition, hERG blockade, Synthesizability, and Toxicity. Below the list is a 3D molecular model of a protein-ligand complex, with a graph showing the relationship between various properties.

Dr. Anjan Sen is presenting

Components of Docking Program

Typically, protein-ligand docking software consist of two main components which work together:

- Search algorithm
- Scoring function

Search algorithm: Searches a large number of poses of a molecule in the binding site.

Scoring function: Ranks the conformations to select the best binding pose for the given ligand.

The slide illustrates the components of a docking program. It shows a search algorithm that explores a large number of poses of a molecule in the binding site, and a scoring function that ranks the conformations to select the best binding pose for the given ligand. The slide includes three molecular models: a ligand, a protein, and a docked complex.
